Is cancer a somatic mutation? What are the 4 types of mutations? Can a mutation be inherited? Are all harmful mutations? Why are somatic mutations important? How do Frameshift mutations occur? Is cystic fibrosis somatic or germinal? How do germ cells form? What is the germ test? What causes germ mutations? Somatic cells are all cells in the body that are not gametes (sperm or egg), germ cells (cells running forward to become gametes) or stem cells. Essentially, all the cells that make up the body of an organism and are not used to directly form a new organism during reproduction are somatic cells. The word somatic comes from the Greek word $\sigma\omicron\mu\alpha\tau\iota\kappa\acute{o}\varsigma$ (soma), which means body. In the human body, there are about 220 types of somatic cells. There are many different types of somatic cells in the human body because almost every cell is inside and on the surface of the human body, with the exception of cells that become sperm and eggs, it is a somatic cell. Furthermore, mammals have many organs systems specialized in specific functions, so there are many different specialized cells. The following is an overview of some main types of cells in the human body. Old bone cells are constantly replaced with new bone cells. The two large categories of bone cells are called osteoblasts and osteoclasts. Osteoblasts form bone and help keep it. They are cubidal, or patterned squares, and make protein α ϵ
